Wandering at Ease – Travel Writing and Geography in Chinese History

This course aims at introducing students to a range of travelogues and geographical writings. We will examine descriptions of the world from different periods and analyse how these writings constituted knowledge of known and unknown, real and imagined worlds. How did the authors experience their environment, how did they make sense of it and how was this reflected in their writings? How important were travel and the experience of place, space and the unknown when comparing first-hand accounts with those of armchair travellers and geographers?

What can we learn about an author's identity and class, as well as Chinese history and culture, through the lens of travelogues and geographical writings? Throughout the course, students will read and discuss a variety of writings from different genres in translation and original language. By the end of the course, students will understand the historical development of travel writing and geography in China.

They will be able to develop their own research questions and conduct individual case studies in this interdisciplinary field. As we will be working with original language material, a solid command of the Chinese written language is required.

Xi Jinping's "ecological civilization" has become a buzzword in recent years. Although the term was invented in the Soviet Union and is aspirational rather than descriptive, it has been misunderstood as a comment on China's history. But what exactly determines how man influences the environment? How did the Chinese actually deal with their environment historically? In 1993, Mark Elvin, a pioneer of the environmental history of China, wrote an article entitled "Three Thousand Years of Unsustainable Growth." He argued that the social structure of power is the single most important factor that decides the relationship between man and nature. The course will take China's history since the Early Modern era as a case study to test this proposition. We will explore the impact of population growth, markets, and politics on decisions concerning the environment, including land, forests, and water resources. We will also look at what Chinese thinkers thought about the environment and how the society dealt with natural hazards like floods, droughts and diseases. If development was "unsustainable", as the tongue-in-cheek title might suggest, what was it that made Chinese pre-industrial society resilient over the long run. This course is reading-intensive and will mainly use the discussion format, mixed with short lectures and student presentations.

Assessment will be based on student participation in class and on individual research papers. The course is taught in English. Students in Sinology who also take the Exercise class are expected to be read and translate academic work and primary sources from Chinese.

Japanese Reading for Sinologists

This course offers an introduction to the reading of Japanese academic texts for students of Chinese Studies. Previous knowledge of Japanese is not required. However, student should have mastered traditional and simplified Chinese characters and be fluent readers of academic Chinese.

03-SIN-5012 Applied Research Methodology II

Hüsemann, Jörg-Henning

Mo 09:15-12:45 NSG S 213

The seminar functions as an interactive community of teachers and learners in which ideas and insights are generated, presented, and discussed. At the same time, it offers a forum for the discussion of fundamental theoretical and methodological questions of historical, cultural and social science research on China. These goals are pursued by means of lectures and co-lectures by the researchers, and joint readings. Special emphasis is placed on the practice of scholarly writing and the introduction to analog and digital forms of scientific knowledge representation and knowledge transfer.
